The Unfinishing Of Things // Exhibition

University of Aberdeen, Old Aberdeen // May to September 2017

Things are never finished. They always overflow the ends set for them; that's how life can carry on.

If knowledge grows from practical engagement with materials, with people and with places, in what form can academic research be presented and shared with others? Alongside conventional journal articles and books, this exhibition has been an opportunity for members of the Knowing From the Inside research project to experiment with this question. Rather than communicate polished research 'findings', somewhat removed from life, the focus of the works presented here is on the process of research. While there is a huge diversity in individual research projects, reflecting the fact that the project's researchers are all working with different people and practices, what unites them is the attention and value placed on a mode of working that is derived from experience, participation and conversation with others. Each exhibit, then, is an invitation to think along and with it.

The exhibition is grouped around three modes of knowing with at the heart of the KFI project: materials at the Duncan Rice Library, place in the foyer of the MacRobert building and people in the James McKay Hall.
